On Tuesday, the Queensland Liberal National Party (LNP) was re-elected with a narrow majority. When Malcolm Turnbull was elected prime minister last year, he seemed to think that his personal mandate would carry him through to a snap general election. But the world has a nasty way of conspiring against the prime minister: trouble with the house, a terrorist attack, a leadership spill, or even just a few journalists asking a few questions. Turnbull was re-elected as Liberal leader after a strong performance at the May 18 leadership ballot. But not long after, Queensland voters handed a majority to Bill Shorten's Labor Party, which swept the final round of the state election with a massive 59-seat victory. (The LNP is now a minority government with 45 seats.) The prime minister's authority has declined substantially since he was first elected leader. He had to make major concessions, like allowing backbenchers to vote on policy, before he was re-elected. On Sunday, he threatened to tear up the coalition agreement and disown the support of the National Party. But after the prime minister was re-elected, he fell back on the "everything is fine" mantra. As usual, he will have to ride out the storm. If he is to survive as prime minister, Turnbull will have to discover how to harness the real authority that comes from a strong majority. He will also have to communicate his leadership to a wider audience than the leaders of the Opposition and the media. As George Orwell observed, "The common people do not merely have masses of facts to hand; they have also a great fund of ready-made opinions, stored up from many generations of stupidity and malice. All that is needed is an up-to-date form of Press Union, which would make it easy to counter falsehood with truth.” This week, Turnbull has had to pretend that the states can afford higher education despite the abolition of the Education Revolution in 2018. He has had to pretend that the resources boom in Queensland means more jobs. And when the prime minister fails to persuade the media, he blames the Labor Party for the poor reception, and even calls for them to “man up.” With a majority of seats in both

Non-Hodgkin lymphomas of the digestive tract are rare neoplasias and their incidence is low, as compared to extranodal lymphomas, of which the latter one represents 40% to 45%. So far, only 3% to 8% of the cases of gastrointestinal lymphomas are located in the small intestine, with the remaining cases located in the large intestine. The diagnosis is based on clinical, radiological, endoscopic, and histological findings. The therapeutic approach is based on the prognosis of the particular group of lymphomas. In intestinal lymphomas of low grade malignancy, mainly those of the small intestine, with restricted local growth and an excellent prognosis, the long-term prognosis is excellent and the survival rates reach 100%. With regard to intestinal lymphomas of high grade malignancy, the long-term prognosis is worse, the survival rates being 50% to 70%. In fact, lymphomas of this type are associated with important and frequent complications, which include the stenosis of the intestinal lumen, rupture, intestinal perforation, and bleeding. The present invention generally relates to a data storage device, and more particularly, to a multi-level data storage device. With the rapid increase in the amount of data to be stored in data storage devices, the size of the memory cell that stores the data is reduced. This reduction in the size of the memory cell allows an increase in the density of the memory array. However, the reduction in the size of the memory cell also reduces the data storage capacity of the memory cell. Furthermore, as the number of levels in the data storage device increases, the number of times a data bit is required to be written to and read from the memory cell increases. Consequently, it becomes necessary to increase the speed of the writing and reading process, which causes a problem in that the time required to complete the reading operation increases.
