This demo shows the basic functions of this type of software. Support for Windows 7/2008/XP/Vista/2003/2000. If you've run this tool before, you'll be familiar with it's features, but if you want to see a detailed review of the program, read on. In the first few screens, make sure to run the program. On the first screen, you are asked to select the open folder, or enter a new directory where the supplied images are. You can even get all pictures from an existing batch if your folder is on a network drive. The second page is the source selection. It is here you can select whether to work with new images or from a batch (if the folder is on network). If you choose 'Delete batch files', the selected images will be removed from the folder. If you choose 'Create new batch files', they will be created in the directory. That's all. We left the basic functions for the demonstration and move to our review of the advanced functions. The dialog window will load, as shown below. Now we move to the Morph Face selection screen. Here you can navigate to the folder with key face images, and select which one to use for evaluation. To activate this feature, you must have a face to select. So the next decision you need to make is whether to use the supplied face or select your own face. This is done by selecting the right button and moving to the 'Face Selection' section. Then you select the one you want to use for the evaluation. Your choice of portrait, frontal or side view becomes effective here, and the next window will pop up. It is important to select one face only, so that there will be no confusion. Here you may select from the provided list of face images, or choose your own image for evaluation. The image processing must be done for one face only, so you must choose carefully. If you don't like the selected image, or the supplied face is not good enough, you can use your own face for evaluation. After saving the configuration, you will be given the image preview window. Select the movie type (8 in our example) for that selected face, then press 'OK'. Now you may initiate the processing. A progress dialog box will appear. Next we will consider the options that the program offers. Morph Type a69d392a70
